

Dear Colleagues, Dear Authors, and Devoted Readers!

Introducing this momentous milestone issue of the Kazan University Law Review, I am filled with a sense of profound professional pride. Back in 2016, we believed that we were creating not just another academic journal, but a global platform for the exchange of cutting-edge ideas among legal scholars from all over the world. Today, with the publication of the journal's 39th issue, we have the ultimate proof that our internationalization strategy has been an unqualified success.

Our primary cause for pride is the unprecedentedly broad geography of our authors and our editorial map of the world. Over the past decade, the journal has made an incredible qualitative leap, transforming from a predominantly Russian publication into a truly international platform. It now unites researchers from the most diverse corners of the planet, including Serbia, France, Poland, China, the USA, Germany, Finland, Turkey, Belarus, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan, Brazil, Sri Lanka, Nigeria, South Africa, Cameroon, Algeria, Iran, and Bangladesh.

I extend my sincere gratitude to the editorial board, the reviewers, and each of our researchers for their trust and highest level of professionalism. This colossal success would have been impossible without the painstaking, daily work of the international editorial council and our peer reviewers.

We invite researchers from all over the world to further collaboration! I wish our authors the successful testing and approbation of their new scientific ideas within the pages of KULR, and I wish the Kazan School of Law continued advancement in the global academic space!

Sincerely,
Dean of the Faculty of Law,
Lilia Bakulina
